

Plain Dharma

Six Foundational Buddhist Teachings in Plain Modern English

Alex Miller

plaindharma.com

Contents

About This Book	1
License	1
Preface	2
1. The Buddha's First Talk	3
The Four Noble Truths	4
Knowing Each One Three Ways	5
How They Heard It	6
2. The Buddha's Second Talk	7
The Questions	8
The Takeaway	9
How They Heard It	9
3. The Buddha's Third Talk: The Fire Sermon	11
The Same Fire, Everywhere	12
What to Do About It	13
How They Heard It	13
4. On Loving-Kindness	14
5. The Foundations of Mindfulness	17
1. Watching the Body	18
2. Watching Your Feelings	21

3. Watching Your Mind	21
4. Watching the Contents of Experience	22
What It Leads To	24
6. How to Decide What to Believe	26
Don't Just Take Anyone's Word For It	27
So What Do You Go On?	28
Now Run It the Other Way	29
The Reassurance at the End	29
Closing	30
Read it Online	31
Sources & Further Reading	33
1. The Buddha's First Talk	33
2. The Buddha's Second Talk	33
3. The Buddha's Third Talk: The Fire Sermon	33
4. On Loving-Kindness	34
5. The Foundations of Mindfulness	34
6. How to Decide What to Believe	34

About This Book

Six Foundational Buddhist Teachings in Plain Modern English.

Six teachings of the Buddha, rendered in plain modern English by Alex Miller. Not a scholarly translation — a plain reading, meant to make the foundational suttas accessible to a first-time reader without sacrificing the substance.

For canonical translations, see Sources & Further Reading at the end of this volume, or visit any of: SuttaCentral, Access to Insight, or the published work of Bhikkhu Bodhi.

License

Released into the public domain under CCo 1.0. Copy it, print it, translate it, distribute it, modify it. No permission needed; no attribution required.

This is in keeping with the Buddhist tradition of free dharma distribution.

Source text and revisions: <https://plaindharma.com>

Preface

After waking under the Bodhi tree, the Buddha sat for a while figuring out what to do. He'd seen something. But could it be said? At first he thought no one would understand. Then he changed his mind, got up, and walked west to find the five old friends he'd left behind when their shared path of harsh self-denial had taken him as far as it could.

He found them in the deer park near Varanasi. They'd resolved not to greet him — he'd quit, after all. But there was something about the way he walked, and by the time he arrived they were preparing him a seat.

1. The Buddha's First Talk

Dhammacakkappavattana Sutta

Between chasing pleasure and punishing yourself, there's a third way. That's the whole thing.

At Varanasi, in the deer park at Isipatana, he addressed the five monks:

“If you’ve left ordinary life behind to find the truth, there are two dead ends you shouldn’t waste yourself on.

1. Chasing pleasure — it’s cheap, shallow, and gets you nowhere.
2. Punishing yourself — it’s painful, pointless, and also gets you nowhere.

Steering clear of both of those, I've found a path that runs down the middle. It clears your sight and settles your mind, and it leads to calm, real understanding, and to true freedom.

And what is that middle path that clears your sight and settles your mind — that leads to calm, real understanding, and true freedom? It's this — eight things to get right:

1. Seeing clearly
2. Living with intention
3. Speaking honestly
4. Acting decently
5. Earning a living that does no harm
6. Working steadily
7. Staying mindful
8. And focusing deeply

That's the middle path I found — the one that clears your sight and settles your mind, and leads to a calm, real understanding, and true freedom.

(These are often called the Noble Eightfold Path: Right View, Right Intention, Right Speech, Right Action, Right Livelihood, Right Effort, Right Mindfulness, Right Concentration.)

The Four Noble Truths

Suffering. Being born is hard. Growing old is hard. Getting sick is hard. Dying is hard. Being stuck with what you can't stand hurts; being torn from what you love hurts; not getting what you want hurts. The whole bundle of grasping at life — that's suffering.

Where it comes from. It comes from craving — the restless wanting that keeps pulling you back for more, hunting for the next good feeling wherever you can find one: wanting pleasure, wanting to keep existing, wanting to stop existing.

How it ends. It's the complete fading-out of that very craving — finally letting it go, releasing it, holding on to none of it.

The way there. It's simply this same eightfold path: seeing clearly, living with intention, speaking honestly, acting decently, earning a living that does no harm, working steadily, staying mindful, and focusing deeply.

Knowing Each One Three Ways

For each of these four truths, my understanding deepened in three steps. Take suffering:

1. First I saw clearly: this is suffering.
2. Then I understood: this is something to be fully grasped.
3. Then I knew: I have fully grasped it.

The same three steps applied to all four:

1. Suffering — recognize it; understand it; I've known it.
 2. Its cause — recognize it; let it go; I've freed myself.
 3. Its ending — recognize it; experience it; I've lived it.
 4. The path — recognize it; develop it; I've made it mine.
-

As long as my understanding of these four truths — in all three steps, across all twelve points — wasn't completely clear, I didn't claim to be fully awakened. But once it was completely clear, then I knew I had woken up fully, with nothing left to do. And the certainty settled in me: My freedom can't be shaken. This is my last birth. There's nothing more after this.

How They Heard It

That's what the Buddha said, and the five of them were glad to hear it.

And while he was speaking, something opened up in one of them, Kondañña — a clear, clean insight cut through:

Anything that begins is something that ends.

And the moment the Buddha set this teaching in motion, the call went up.

All of Earth's gods cried out: "Near Varanasi, in the deer park at Isipatana, the Buddha has set in motion the unsurpassed wheel of truth — and no one anywhere, no seeker or sage, no god, no demon, no one at all, can stop it from turning."

And the moment the Buddha set this teaching going, word of it seemed to ripple outward and upward, further and further, as if the whole universe had felt it move.

So in that moment, in that instant, the cry rose all the way to the highest heavens. The ten-thousandfold universe-system shook and shuddered and trembled, and a vast, boundless light broke out across it — brighter even than the radiance of the gods themselves.

Then the Buddha spoke these words: "Kondañña has understood! Kondañña has truly understood!"

And that's how Kondañña came to be called Añña Kondañña — Kondañña Who Knows.

2. The Buddha's Second Talk

Anattalakkhana Sutta

When you loosen your grip on what you take yourself to be, you stop being so easily wounded by what happens to it.

The Buddha was still at the deer park near Varanasi, and he turned to the five seekers and said:

“Here’s something to look at closely. The body isn’t you.

If the body really were you — your self, the thing you actually are — then it would never let you down, and you’d be able to tell it: ‘Be like this, don't be like that,' and it would obey. But you can't. The body gets sick, ages, falls apart, ignores your wishes completely. That's the giveaway: it isn't you.

And the same goes for the rest of what you take yourself to be:

1. The body isn't you.
2. Your feelings — pleasant, unpleasant, neutral — aren't you.
3. Your perceptions — the way you recognize and label things — aren't you.
4. Your impulses and reactions — the mental habits that push you around — aren't you.
5. Your awareness itself — the knowing that's happening — isn't you.

For every one of them, it's the same test: if it were truly you, it would do what you say and never cause you grief. But none of them do. They all break down, shift, and run on their own. So none of them are you."

(These five are traditionally called the Five Aggregates — in canonical translation: form, feeling, perception, mental formations, consciousness.)

The Questions

Then the Buddha walked them through it directly.

"Tell me — is the body something that lasts, or something that changes?"

"It changes," they said.

"And something that's always changing — does that bring ease, or does it bring suffering?"

"Suffering."

“So does it make any sense to look at something that’s always changing, that brings suffering, that won’t hold still — and say, ‘This is mine, this is what I am, this is my self?’”

“No. It doesn’t.”

He ran the same three questions through all five — body, feelings, perceptions, impulses, awareness — and every time the answer came back the same: always changing, never reliable, not worth calling “me.”

The Takeaway

“So here’s how to see it. Any body at all — past, future, or right now; your own or someone else’s; near or far; big or small — look at it honestly and you’ll see: this isn’t mine, this isn’t what I am, this isn’t my self.

And the same for every feeling, every perception, every impulse, every flicker of awareness — all of it: not mine, not me, not myself.

When you really see this, you stop being so gripped by all of it. You loosen your hold on the body, on feelings, on perceptions, on impulses, on awareness. And when the grip lets go, you’re free. And once you’re free, you know you’re free — you can feel it directly: Done. There’s nothing left to chase. This is finished.”

How They Heard It

That’s what the Buddha said, and the five of them were glad to hear it.

And while he was speaking, something completed in all five of them at once. Letting go of every last bit of grasping, their minds came fully free.

At that point there were six fully awakened people in the world — the five of them, and the Buddha.

3. The Buddha's Third Talk: The Fire Sermon

Adittapariyaya Sutta

The three fires — wanting, anger, confusion — are always burning somewhere in you. Noticing them is how they cool.

The Buddha was on a hill near Gaya with a thousand seekers — men who had spent their whole lives tending sacred fires before they joined him. So he put it to them in the language they knew best:

“Everything is on fire. Let me show you what I mean — and what’s burning.

Take seeing.

1. Your eyes are on fire.
2. The things you see are on fire.
3. The seeing itself — the awareness that lights up when eye meets object — is on fire.
4. The contact between them is on fire.
5. And whatever you feel because of that contact — good, bad, or in-between — that’s on fire too.

Burning with what? Burning with wanting. Burning with anger. Burning with confusion. And burning with the whole weight that comes attached: birth, aging, death, grief, sadness, pain, despair. That’s the fire.”

The Same Fire, Everywhere

Then he ran it through every way a person takes in the world — not just seeing, but all six channels:

1. Seeing — eyes, sights, and everything that follows: on fire.
2. Hearing — ears, sounds, and everything that follows: on fire.
3. Smelling — nose, smells, and everything that follows: on fire.
4. Tasting — tongue, tastes, and everything that follows: on fire.
5. Touching — body, sensations, and everything that follows: on fire.
6. Thinking — mind, thoughts, and everything that follows: on fire.

Every single one — the sense, what it lands on, the awareness that flares up, the contact, and the feeling that comes out of it — all of it burning with the same three flames: wanting, anger, confusion. And all of it dragging along birth, aging, death, and every kind of sorrow.

(These six are the Six Sense Bases. The three flames are traditionally translated as greed, hatred, and delusion.)

What to Do About It

“So here’s what happens when you really see this.

You stop being so taken with all of it. You cool toward your eyes and toward what you see; toward your ears and what you hear; toward your nose, tongue, body, and mind, and everything they reach for; and toward every feeling that any of it stirs up — good, bad, or in-between. You stop grabbing.

And when you stop grabbing — when the wanting cools — you’re free. Once you’re free, you know it directly: Done. There’s nothing left to chase. This is finished.”

How They Heard It

That’s what the Buddha said.

And as he was speaking, something let go in all thousand of them. With nothing left to cling to, their minds came completely free — every one of them.

4. On Loving-Kindness

Metta Sutta

Remember the mother and her only child. Open your heart that wide — toward every living thing, with no one left out.

Here's what someone should do if they want to live well and find real peace.

Be capable and honest — genuinely honest, the kind that goes all the way down. Be easy to talk to. Be gentle. Don't carry yourself like you're better than anyone.

Live simply. Be easy to please. Don't pile your life full of obligations. Keep your needs light. Stay calm and clear-headed. Don't be pushy, and don't cling to people just for what they can give you.

And never do even the smallest thing that thoughtful people would later look at and shake their heads over.

Instead, hold this wish in your heart:

May everyone be at ease. May everyone be safe. May everyone be happy.

And mean everyone — no exceptions. Whatever's alive out there:

1. The fragile and the strong, every one of them.
2. The big, the small, the in-between.
3. The ones you can see and the ones you can't.
4. The ones nearby and the ones far away.
5. The ones already here and the ones not yet born.

May all of them, without leaving a single one out, be happy.

Don't lie to anyone. Don't look down on anyone, anywhere. Don't let anger or resentment make you wish harm on another person.

Think of how a mother would protect her only child — willing to put her own life on the line for it. Open your heart that wide, but toward every living thing.

Let that goodwill fill the whole world — above you, below you, all around you — with no walls in it, no grudge, no enemy anywhere in it.

Whether you're standing, walking, sitting, or lying down — for as long as you're awake — keep this in your heart. This is the finest way a person can live.

And the one who lives like this — who doesn't get trapped in rigid opinions, who's decent and sees clearly, who's worked through the pull of craving — that person is free, and won't be caught in this whole cycle again.

5. The Foundations of Mindfulness

Satipatthana Sutta

You don't have to fix what you notice. Watching is enough. Body, feelings, mind, experience — the four are always there.

The Buddha was staying among the Kuru people, and he said to the gathered seekers:

“There’s a direct road — one path — that leads all the way to clarity and freedom: to getting past sorrow and grief, ending pain and distress, and reaching peace. It’s the practice of keeping four things steadily in view.

What four? You watch the body as just body. You watch your feelings as just feelings. You watch your mind as just mind. You watch the contents of experience as just what they are. In each case you stay alert, clear, and aware, having set aside — for now — the wanting and worrying that usually run the show.”

(These four are called the Four Foundations of Mindfulness — Satipaṭṭhāna, the title of this teaching.)

1. Watching the Body

The Breath

“Here’s where to start. Go somewhere quiet — under a tree, an empty room, wherever’s still. Sit down, settle your body upright, and bring your attention to what’s right in front of you: the breath.

Just breathe, and know you’re breathing. Breathing in a long breath, you know it’s long. Breathing in a short one, you know it’s short. You don’t control it — you watch it, the whole length of each in-breath and out-breath, clearly. Over time you learn to let the breath, and the body around it, grow calm and quiet.

Think of someone skilled at a craft who knows exactly what their hands are doing at every moment — that’s the quality of attention.

So you watch the body as just body — sometimes from the inside, sometimes the way you’d notice it in anyone, sometimes both. You watch how things arise, how they pass, how they arise and pass. You stay aware just enough to keep knowing and seeing clearly — not leaning on anything, not grabbing at anything in the world. That’s how a person watches the body as just body.”

Postures and Movement

“Wherever your body is, know it. Walking, you know you’re walking. Standing, sitting, lying down — you know it. However you’re holding yourself, you’re aware of it.

Then take it into everything you do. Going out, coming back — you do it with awareness. Looking around, reaching, bending, lifting, carrying. Eating, drinking, chewing, tasting. Using the bathroom. Falling asleep, waking up, talking, staying quiet. In all of it, you’re present and aware.

So you watch the body as just body — sometimes from the inside, sometimes the way you’d notice it in anyone, sometimes both. You watch how it arises, how it passes, how it arises and passes. You stay aware just enough to keep knowing and seeing clearly — not leaning on anything, not grabbing at anything in the world. That’s how a person watches the body as just body.”

The Body, Part by Part

“Now look at this body honestly, from the soles of the feet up and from the top of the head down — skin and everything packed inside it: hair, nails, teeth, skin, flesh, sinews, bones, marrow, organs, blood, and all the rest.

Picture a sack with the drawstring open, full of different grains, and someone tips it out and looks: ‘that’s rice, that’s wheat, those are beans.’ Same thing — you look at the body plainly and see it for the collection of parts it actually is, nothing more.

So you watch the body as just body — sometimes from the inside, sometimes the way you’d notice it in anyone, sometimes both. You watch how it arises, how it passes, how it arises and passes. You stay aware just enough to keep knowing and seeing clearly — not leaning on anything, not grabbing at anything in the world. That’s how a person watches the body as just body.”

The Body as Elements

“Or look at the body in terms of what it’s made of — solidity, liquid, heat, movement — the same basic stuff as everything else in the physical world. A butcher who’s cut up an animal no longer sees ‘a creature,’ just the parts laid out. Same with the body: not a special ‘me,’ just material, the way everything material is.

So you watch the body as just body — sometimes from the inside, sometimes the way you’d notice it in anyone, sometimes both. You watch how it arises, how it passes, how it arises and passes. You stay aware just enough to keep knowing and seeing clearly — not leaning on anything, not grabbing at anything in the world. That’s how a person watches the body as just body.”

The Body Will Die

“And here’s the hardest one to face, but the most clarifying. Imagine coming across a dead body — a day old, then days old, then breaking down, then bones, then dust. And turn to your own body and tell the truth: this body is the same kind of thing. It’s headed there too. There’s no exception being made for me.

So you watch the body as just body — sometimes from the inside, sometimes the way you’d notice it in anyone, sometimes both. You watch how it arises, how it passes, how it arises and passes. You stay aware just enough to keep knowing and seeing clearly — not leaning on anything, not grabbing at anything in the world. That’s how a person watches the body as just body.”

2. Watching Your Feelings

“Whatever you’re feeling, just know it for what it is.

1. Feeling something pleasant, you know: this is pleasant.
2. Feeling something painful, you know: this is painful.
3. Feeling something neutral, you know: this is neutral.

And you can notice a finer layer too — whether a feeling is the plain physical kind, or the deeper kind tangled up with your sense of self. You don’t have to chase the good ones or shove away the bad ones. You just see each feeling clearly as it shows up and as it fades.

So you watch your feelings as just feelings — sometimes from the inside, sometimes the way you’d notice them in anyone, sometimes both. You watch how a feeling arises, how it passes, how it arises and passes. You stay aware just enough to keep knowing and seeing clearly — not leaning on anything, not grabbing at anything in the world. That’s how a person watches feelings as just feelings.”

3. Watching Your Mind

“Now turn the same clear attention onto the state of your own mind. Whatever mood or quality is running, you simply recognize it — without judging it, without trying to fix it in the moment. You just see it:

1. A mind with wanting in it — you know it. A mind free of wanting — you know that too.
2. A mind with anger — known. A mind without anger — known.
3. A mind that’s foggy and dull — known. A clear one — known.
4. A scattered mind — known. A gathered, settled one — known.
5. A small, contracted mind, or a wide, open one — known.

6. A restless mind, or a still and steady one — known.
7. A trapped mind, or a free one — known.

You're just naming the weather of the mind honestly, watching each state come and go.

So you watch the mind as just mind — sometimes from the inside, sometimes the way you'd notice it in anyone, sometimes both. You watch how a state arises, how it passes, how it arises and passes. You stay aware just enough to keep knowing and seeing clearly — not leaning on anything, not grabbing at anything in the world. That's how a person watches the mind as just mind."

4. Watching the Contents of Experience

"Finally, watch the patterns that actually shape your experience — the moving parts underneath it all.

The Five Hindrances

Notice what's getting in the way. When wanting is present, know it's there; when it's gone, know that — and understand how it showed up and how it can be kept from coming back. Do the same with ill will, with dullness and drowsiness, with restlessness and worry, and with nagging doubt. Five things that cloud the mind — see each one clearly, present or absent.

So you watch the contents of experience as just what they are — sometimes from the inside, sometimes the way you'd notice them in anyone, sometimes both. You watch how they arise, how they pass, how they arise and pass. You stay aware just enough to keep knowing and seeing clearly — not leaning on anything, not grabbing at anything in the world. That's how a person watches the contents of experience as just what they are.

The Five Aggregates

Watch the very pieces you take yourself to be — body, feeling, perception, impulse, awareness — and see each one for what it is: here's how this arises, and here's how it passes. (These are the same five from the Not-Self talk.)

So you watch the contents of experience as just what they are — sometimes from the inside, sometimes the way you'd notice them in anyone, sometimes both. You watch how they arise, how they pass, how they arise and pass. You stay aware just enough to keep knowing and seeing clearly — not leaning on anything, not grabbing at anything in the world. That's how a person watches the contents of experience as just what they are.

The Six Senses

Notice how you get hooked. Through the eyes, ears, nose, tongue, body, and mind, you make contact with the world — and a kind of binding can form between you and what you sense. See that binding as it forms, see it when it lets go, and understand how to keep it from forming again.

So you watch the contents of experience as just what they are — sometimes from the inside, sometimes the way you'd notice them in anyone, sometimes both. You watch how they arise, how they pass, how they arise and pass. You stay aware just enough to keep knowing and seeing clearly — not leaning on anything, not grabbing at anything in the world. That's how a person watches the contents of experience as just what they are.

The Seven Pieces of Awakening

Notice the helpful qualities when they're present, and learn how to grow them: clear attention, genuine investigation, energy, a settled gladness, calm, a collected mind, and an even, balanced steadiness.

When each is there, know it; know how it took root and how to strengthen it.

So you watch the contents of experience as just what they are — sometimes from the inside, sometimes the way you'd notice them in anyone, sometimes both. You watch how they arise, how they pass, how they arise and pass. You stay aware just enough to keep knowing and seeing clearly — not leaning on anything, not grabbing at anything in the world. That's how a person watches the contents of experience as just what they are.

The Four Truths

And finally, see the four truths from the very first talk directly in your own experience: this is suffering; this is where it comes from; this is its ending; this is the path. Not as ideas now — as things you watch happening in you.

So you watch the contents of experience as just what they are — sometimes from the inside, sometimes the way you'd notice them in anyone, sometimes both. You watch how they arise, how they pass, how they arise and pass. You stay aware just enough to keep knowing and seeing clearly — not leaning on anything, not grabbing at anything in the world. That's how a person watches the contents of experience as just what they are.”

What It Leads To

“Anyone who keeps these four in view like this — steadily, honestly — can come to full freedom. Some get there quickly, some over a longer stretch, but the road is real and it runs all the way through.

This is that direct path — the one road that leads past sorrow and grief, through the end of pain and distress, all the way to peace.”

That's what the Buddha said, and the seekers were glad to hear it.

6. How to Decide What to Believe

Kalama Sutta

Nothing here asks for your faith. Test it against your own life. If it leads to harm, drop it. If it leads to ease and clarity, take it up.

The Buddha was traveling and came to a town called Kesaputta, home to a people called the Kalamas. They'd heard of him, so they came to meet him, and they laid out an honest problem:

“Teachers keep passing through here. Each one explains his own ideas in glowing terms — and tears every other teacher to shreds. Then the next one comes through and does the exact same thing in reverse. We’re left standing here genuinely not knowing: out of all these people, who’s telling the truth and who isn’t?”

“I get why you’re stuck,” the Buddha said. “It’s a fair thing to be unsure about. So let me give you something better than another opinion to take on faith.”

Don’t Just Take Anyone’s Word For It

“Here’s the thing. Don’t accept something as true just because —

1. You’ve heard it repeated a lot.
2. It’s been handed down for generations.
3. ‘Everybody says so.’
4. It’s written in some respected book.
5. It sounds logical.
6. It fits a theory you already like.
7. It seems reasonable on the surface.
8. It agrees with what you already believe.
9. The person saying it seems impressive.
10. Or ‘because the teacher said so’ — even if that teacher is me.

None of those, on their own, make a thing true.”

(These ten are called the Ten Grounds of Not-Knowing — the things on which you shouldn’t base your belief.)

So What Do You Go On?

“Test it yourself. When you genuinely know, from your own honest looking — these things are harmful; these things are blamed by thoughtful people; acting on these leads to harm and pain — then drop them.

Let’s check it together. When greed takes over a person, is that good for them or bad?”

“Bad,” they said.

“And a greedy person, gripped by wanting — do they end up harming themselves and others? Lying, stealing, hurting people, dragging others into it?”

“They do.”

“What about anger? When someone’s consumed by hatred — better or worse for them?”

“Worse.”

“And confusion — being lost, not seeing clearly?”

“Also worse.”

“So these things — greed, anger, confusion — when you really look: are they good or bad? Praised or criticized by sensible people? Do they lead, when you act on them, toward harm or away from it?”

“Toward harm,” they said. “That’s how it looks to us.”

“Then there’s your answer,” he said. “That’s exactly what I meant — don’t take it from authority or tradition. You just worked it out for yourselves, from what you can actually see.”

Now Run It the Other Way

“And do the same in reverse. When you genuinely know, from your own looking — these things are good; these things are praised by thoughtful people; acting on them leads to ease and wellbeing — then take them up and live by them.

When greed is absent, when anger is absent, when confusion gives way to clear seeing — does a person like that harm others, or treat them well?”

“They treat them well,” they said.

“So generosity, kindness, and clear understanding — good or bad? Lead toward harm, or away from it?”

“Away from it. They’re good.”

“Right. That’s the test, and you can run it on anything, for the rest of your life. Not ‘because I said so’ — because you looked, and you saw.”

The Reassurance at the End

“And here’s something to set your mind at ease. Someone who lives this way — clear, kind, free of greed and hatred — fills their own life with calm and goodwill right now, in this life. And if it turns out there’s something after this life, they’re in good standing for it. And if it turns out there isn’t, they’ve still lived well and at peace, here, while they were alive.

Either way, they come out fine. There’s nothing to fear in living decently and seeing clearly.”

The Kalamas were glad, and thanked him.

Closing

Six teachings. That's the foundation — what he actually said, before any of it became a religion, before there were schools or commentaries.

Read them slowly. Read them more than once. The work from here is yours.

Read it Online

Every format of this book lives at plaindharma.com — all free under CCo.

- Read it in the browser
- Download the PDF or EPUB
- Listen to the narrated audiobook — a 38-minute reading of all six teachings
- Print booklets for free distribution at temples and retreats

Updates and corrections, when they happen, go up there first.

Released under CCo 1.0. Copy it, print it, translate it, distribute it — no permission needed.

Sources & Further Reading

Each of these six teachings is preserved in the Pali Canon. The references and translations below are the rigorous scholarly sources behind this plain-English rendering. If a teaching here moves you, the next step is to read the same passage as translated by a working scholar.

1. The Buddha's First Talk

Dhammacakkappavattana Sutta — SN 56.11

- Thanissaro Bhikkhu \(Access to Insight\)
- SuttaCentral

2. The Buddha's Second Talk

Anattalakkhana Sutta — SN 22.59

- Thanissaro Bhikkhu \(Access to Insight\)
- SuttaCentral

3. The Buddha's Third Talk: The Fire Sermon

Ādittapariyāya Sutta — SN 35.28

- Thanissaro Bhikkhu \(Access to Insight\)
- SuttaCentral

4. On Loving-Kindness

Karaṇīya Mettā Sutta — Snp 1.8

- Thanissaro Bhikkhu \(Access to Insight\)
- SuttaCentral

5. The Foundations of Mindfulness

Satipaṭṭhāna Sutta — MN 10

- Soma Thera \(Access to Insight\)
- SuttaCentral

6. How to Decide What to Believe

Kālāma Sutta — AN 3.65

- Thanissaro Bhikkhu \(Access to Insight\)
- SuttaCentral